I., October 30, 1855 Thy two breasts, are like two young roes that are twins, which feed among the lilies. Until the day break - or, rather, until it breathe, with the first pulsation of morning light - and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense. Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee! No one, certainly, will question the beauty of this passage from the sacred Idyl. It greets us with the freshness of morning-land upon it. Spice-winds and balm imbue the words. The tremulous shafts of the Eastern dawn are hardly more clear and pure from taint, than are these lines from the touch of artificial or meretricious ornament. Through them, rather, we meet the shepherd-soul, still fresh and strong in the midst of all the shows of station, imbued essentially with the love of nature and the sense of its charms, walking forth in symmetric and undebased beauty, to utter its thought in happy song. No passage of the earlier poetry of any land breathes a sweeter aroma of nature throughout it; and none more deftly, with an intuitive grace that outruns art and mocks imitation, selects the most picturesque forms and types to set forth its object. The Poet must always accept it as a triumph, not of practice but of genius, not of artifice but of nature, in his...
