The sections are electrically connected with each other at the top and bottom alternately, as shown in figure 5, Plate X. The elevating rheostat (Pls. VII and X) is essentially like the retracting rheostat, except that it is made up of eight sections and has a higher resistance and lower capacity. (In the case of carriages manufactured at Watertown Arsenal it has been found necessary when elevating or depressing to cut out one or two sections of resistance in the elevating rheostat in order to start the motor with the controller handle at the first notch.) The resistance sections should be so connected to the leads as to give the proper proportion of resistance between the five contact points. Referring to the diagrammatic representation of the elevating rheostat, the blank rectangles may be considered as resistances interposed between the contact points. The Commutating Switch (Pls. VII and X) consists of a cylinder of insulating material carrying eight copper contact pieces, a, a, b, b, c, c, d, and d, arranged one above the other. They are connected in pairs, a to a, b to b, etc. Mounted on a stationary block of insulating material are eight contact fingers arranged so as to come in contact simultaneously with the contact pieces on the cylinder when the latter is rotated. The extension of the cylinder shaft above the top of the casing is provided with a lever, by means...
