I inserted a small portion of infected tissue out of the peripleural abscess of a patient suffering from primary aktinomykosis of the lungs through an incision into the abdomen. The rabbit showed no symptoms of illness during life; the patient died. . . . The rabbit was killed June 12th, 1883. In the abdomen were found a number of swellings from the size of a cherry to that of a grain of hemp seed This gives the first proof of the possibility of transmitting aktinomykosis from man to animals Evidently the rabbit is not a very favourable subject for the development of this disease. --Centralblait fur die Med.
